Report: Churchill By Roy Jenkins I believe it was Polybius who argued that a great historian or biographer must have one, or ideally all three, of the following qualifications: they must have visited the locations in which the events took place, be in the same occupation as the person or person's they are writing about and perhaps best of all they should have known or at least felt the effects of the person or events they are documenting. Roy Jenkins manages to fit the bill for all three.
